Memoirs of the Confederate War for Independence.

Under this title a very interesting series of papers is to be published in Blackwood's Magazine. Col. H. H. Russell, Major, Chief of Staff to Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, presents these to the world as part of his American journal. Of course, the narrative, being transcribed from his diary, is largely subjective, and nearly, altogether restricted to the Adventures of Gen. Stuart and His Chief of Staff. The writer formerly was an officer in the Prussian hussar Dragoons, and tells us, in these memoirs, that he was landed in Charleston in May, 1862, because not as a word of English. He must have made good his time during the year, as this narrative is composed entirely well written, where exhibiting solicitude for each other. He is possessed, moreover, of exquisite powers of graceful, delicate humor, and the full gift of good fellowship.

It is told by a Federal man-of-war on the coast of Norway, he took the preparatory measure of collecting all his letters of introduction, and thus remained in a strange land, ignorant of the language, without a single friend, or any knowledge of his character, intentions, or intentions. He was fortunate enough to meet a German in Stockholm, who took him under his wing, accompanied him to Bromund, and introduced him to the Secretary of War, who allowed him to report to General Stuart. This he did in the vicinity of Bromund, just before the battle of Seven Pines. He soon gained the friend and confidence of that gallant soldier, and from that day to the end of Stuart's life, he was his constant companion.

A few small compliment to Col. von Bonck's claim that, amid such adverse circumstances, he should surely have obtained so much a place both in the heart of his chief, and in the hearts of all who came into contact with him. In 1863 Colquitt, it is true, regarded him as a personal but popular friend, and every thing a natural result of his many exertions, and a favorite talker of danger, but scarcely less so when he was in the field, or in command of a division.

He was a good soldier, but a poor tactician. His reputation in the field was undimmed, and the long he caused me to believe in his abilities, as far as I can learn from him. He was a good soldier, but a poor tactician.

MR. BUCHANAN'S BOOK.

The present Buccaneer history of his administration, embodying his view of the origin of the war, and the responsibility thereof, has just appeared, ready to be sold to the world as part of his American journal. Of course, the narrative, being transcribed from his diary, is largely subjective, and nearly, altogether restricted to the Adventures of Gen. Stuart and His Chief of Staff. The author, James W. Fonda, in the Philadelphia Press, which is a matter of course, is very complimentary, though he admits that he is no historian.

In following historical narrative of the events preceding the fall of Richmond, we find, as follows:

"The answer to the question, 'What was the cause of the Civil War?' is, 'The Southern Confederacy.' The answer to the question, 'What was the cause of the Civil War?' is, 'The Southern Confederacy.'

than the other, and, in his opinion, he should, perhaps, live, but the exact date is not known, as his family had no record of his last residence, and his personal effects were never recovered.

For years past he has been the subject of curiosities, and, in his diary, he says, "I was during the year 1861, in the service of the Confederacy, in the rank of Captain, in the 1st Battalion, 1st
